

Pedro Pierluisi now holds a five-point edge in the race for Governor but 19% of voters are undecided

The Puerto Rico Herald obtained the key findings of a survey of Puerto Rico registered and likely voters. The poll was conducted between October 13th to October 15th, 2020 by a nationally recognized public opinion research firm. The poll, not conducted for any candidate or party, included questions on a wide array of important topics, using a scientifically designed sample across all of Puerto Rico regions, age groups, gender and socioeconomic levels to produce reliable findings regarding the current attitudes of registered voters about issues and potential candidates for office. The margin of error is +/- 3%.

Pedro Pierluisi currently holds a five-point edge in the race for governor, down two from the previous poll. He gets 31% of the vote, with Charlie Delgado at 26% (+2). Alexandra Lúgaro (7%, -2) and Juan Dalmau (8%) are still behind. However, 19% of voters are undecided, meaning this race is still wide open.

OTHER RACES

Jenniffer González remains in the lead to head back to Washington, topping Aníbal Acevedo Vilá 44% to 26%. Acevedo keeps closing the gap but he may be out of time to pull off an upset. The rest of the field is too far back to make a strong showing.

The San Juan Mayor's office is an open seat after incumbent Carmen Yulín unsuccessfully ran for Governor for the PPD. The State Senator for the San Juan district Miguel Romero has a commanding 11% lead over State Senator Rosana López León, while State Representative Manuel Natal has a strong showing at 10%. However, as in other races, the number of undecided voters is staggering.

The PNP's lead on the generic legislative ballot is now 9 points,. Still, 17% of voters are undecided and these races could break either way. Recent news developments may impact these races.

